3. On 22 April 1969, a press conference was held by nine representatives of the National Student Association in the Agricultural Committee Room, U. S. House of Representatives, through the efforts of Congressman Allard K. Lowenstein. At the press conference, the students released a letter to the President and a joint declaration which purportedly was signed by a group of 250 student government leaders and campus newspaper leaders. The declaration stated that all the signatories would refuse induction into the Armed Forces as long as the war in Vietnam continues, and would aid and support others who decided to refuse military service.

4. On 29 April 1969, eight members of the same student delegation met with Presidential Assistant Dr. Henry A. Kissinger at the White House, and again stated their intentions to refuse military induction if selected.

Spokesman for Liberals in U.S. Finds Faults at Both Extremes

By Ivan G. Goldman

(A Member of The Star's Staff)

AT times the new left arrives with accurate assessments of America's problems, Rep. Alard K. Lowenstein (D-N. Y.) admitted today, but unfortunately the solutions often are worse than the problems.

The 40-year-old anti-establishment leader, who delivered the keynote address last night at the controversial Robert F. Kennedy symposium, was surrounded by admirers this morning as he ate a hurried breakfast in a restaurant before rushing to the Municipal Air Terminal for a 10:30 o'clock flight.

Identified With Revolutionaries

He acknowledged that radicals seem to hold him more in contempt than they do more moderate or conservative leaders. Yet many uninformed persons confuse his programs with those advocated by a revolutionary left that despises him, he said.

Radicals have plagued the independent-minded Lowenstein throughout his career. On his speaking tours they generally try to bait him with hostile questions. At the breakfast, sponsored by the Greater Kansas City chapter of the New Democratic coalition, he noted that he tries to avoid argument with angry revolutionaries, since he feels they do not represent a significant political philosophy in America.

Lowenstein, a champion of liberal causes since the early 1950s, has managed, however, to maintain good relations with conservative elements. In November he was elected to office in a Long Island district that has long been a Republican stronghold.

He attributes his election to the fact that his constituents expect him to follow the path he believes best—not the path of partisanship.

"I think it is important to get across to people," he said, "that it is the middle that has to move this country—not the right or left. Whichever way we go depends upon us—the people trying to bring about social change."

The far left is dedicated to the principle that America is incapable of attaining social justice under existing institutions, he said, while the far right mistakenly believes the nation must not move—that it must be committed to the status quo.

"The problem of that right faction," Lowenstein continued, "is that they function on slogans, while they don't understand programs."

It is not the activity of the extremists that endangers the country, he declared, but the apathy of political middle. And too often, he added, those seeking change are confused with the radicals. He noted, for instance, that television cameras covering his speech in Pierson hall at the University of Missouri-Kansas City dwelled on a section of the audience beards and the impression of a majority.

Most Are Moderate

Most of the audience, he noted, seemed to be members of that very center of the political spectrum he hopes to arouse.

Lowenstein, by the very nature of his election in a year that witnessed tragedy and defeat among the antiestablishment contingent, has sparked political awareness in audiences across the country. He combines a talent for winning with a polished store of rhetoric that he uses with facility to argue his causes.

It has been observed that regardless of one's feelings toward him, Lowenstein does not fail to arouse thoughtful attention. His followers also like to think of him as a man with luck as well as talent.

He himself likes to point out that he was the last president of the National Student association (1951-52) not to be tainted with accepting clandestine Central Intelligence agency funds. That N. S. A.-CIA connection was revealed in 1967.

It was Lowenstein who sparked the "children's crusade" for McCarthy with a speech he made at the 1967 N. S. A. convention. His admirers are hopeful that, as a U. S. representative, he can spark that same crusading spirit among adults.

Lowenstein Wins Nod by Nigeria To Use Airstrip for Biafra Relief

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia, Feb. 21—The federal Nigerian government has offered to surrender the use of Obilagu airstrip for daytime landings of relief supplies for Biafra, it was announced at a news conference here today.

Nigerian Commissioner for External Affairs Okoi Arikpo announced the offer and said it was the result of moves initiated by Rep. Allard Lowenstein (D-N.Y.), who traveled between Addis Ababa and Lagos to arrange it.

Arikpo said Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie was told of the offer in a special message from Maj. Gen. Uakubu Gowon, Nigerian head of state.

Arikpo delivered the message to Haile Selassie, who is chairman of the Consultative Committee on Nigeria of the Organization of African Unity.

Relief cargos flown into Obilagu, some 15 miles east of Okigwe and 80 miles north of Port Harcourt, would be taken into Biafra by road, Arikpo said.

They would be transferred to trucks after inspection by a representative team of officials from the OAU and one or two countries mutually acceptable to both sides in the civil war.

Arikpo said, "We could have a simplified airlift carried out during daylight by all relief organizations wherever they may be based, flying relief supplies into the Obilagu strip which we control."

[The United States is considering giving additional relief to both sides in the civil war, the State Department said in Washington today. But the United States feels the amount is limited by political obstacles, a Department spokesman said. If these could be overcome, U.S. planes as well as those of world relief agencies could start an extensive airlift to Obilagu airstrip, observers suggested.]

Gowon's message to Haile Selassie indicated very clearly that he was willing to attend any meeting of the OAU Consultative Committee, Arikpo noted.

"I think all members of the Consultative Committee are agreed that they should meet as soon as possible to make another effort at solution," he said.

Lowenstein on Hill: Still in a Hurry

Approved for Release
Date 5 OCT 1982

By KENNETH IKENBERRY
Star Staff Writer

Has Allard K. Lowenstein finally settled down? The answer, of course, is no.

There are good reasons to think that he might. He is a congressman now, no longer only a prophet and rallier of the clean-cut, idealistic student movement.

He is 40 years old and his wife, Jenny, has given birth to their second child.

But Lowenstein has no desire to slow down. He feels that he has, if anything, accelerated his pace since coming to Capitol Hill in January.

"People keep asking me if I'm not frustrated here," he said. "No, I'm not. It's the same business of trying very hard."

Seated on one of the marble abutments of the Capitol steps last week, legs drawn up, hands resting on his knees, the freshman New York congressman had the look of a wise dorm counselor — the man who is a little older but still youthful, who has seen something of the world and is bringing it back to the campus.

Practically everyone he meets feels Lowenstein is his good friend, and he has met thousands and thousands of people, many of them young.

In the past 20 years he has been propelling himself through the political world at an astonishing pace, and has surrounded himself with an atmosphere of constant urgency.

A Lowenstein aide, Emory Bundy, recalls one of his visits to Seattle a few years ago. Bundy and others arranged a meeting for him to speak to.

"I had lived in Seattle all my life, and I thought I knew quite a few people there. I had the impression after he was there that I didn't know anyone. Al seemed to know everybody in the city."

Typical Gathering

A typical Lowenstein social gathering might consist of two dozen people who have never met before waiting someplace for Lowenstein to arrive from a previous engagement, or perhaps several previous engagements.

When he finally arrives, often late in the night, he introduces all his friends to one another.

His correspondence is staggering. "I counted 2,000 people that he had, within a year, written to at least once," Bundy recalls. This averages out to nearly six letters a day, and helps explain, along with the smacking engagements and the end-student peace movement were reassembled on a heavily populated strip of Long Island, the Fifth Congressional District.

In this suburban, solidly Republican district, the McCarthy campaign was re-created in miniature. Platoons of young campaign workers canvassed the subdivisions, seeking politely to make conversions.

The Lowenstein optimism is apparent as he analyzes his surprising victory. It was, he feels, a sign that the middle class is greatly distressed by the war, that the people needed only a vehicle for expressing their discontent.

Reflecting on Victory

His opponent in the race was Mason L. Hampton Jr., a member of New York's Conservative Party who had gotten the Republican nomination.

The generation gap in the campaign was never more apparent than when Hampton distributed a campaign photograph of himself with four middle-aged women dressed as pom-pom girls and calling themselves "Mothers for Hampton."

At Lowenstein headquarters on election night, when victory was assured, the band played "Mrs. Robinson," and the congressman-elect announced that "young America has to be heard in Congress as it hasn't been heard before."

It is probably his close association with "young America" that accounts for what an aide calls the "aura of radicalism" that surrounds him.

He is basically an old-fashioned liberal, a child of the New Deal.

His causes have been numerous, ranging in locale from Spain to Vietnam to South West Africa to Mississippi, where he helped organize the Freedom Democratic Party. At one time he worked as a foreign policy adviser to then-Sen. Hubert Humphrey, although not for long. For one thing, he has never been very happy in an office.

Sitting in the sun outside the Capitol last week, just back from Freeport, Long Island, where there were race problems, the very junior member of the House Agriculture Committee talked of building a national constituency against the war, against the ABM, for social reform.

"The place to be most effective is not on the floor of Congress," he said. "If you want to be of any use you have to build public opinion."

"With the campuses flying apart what do the politicians do? They go off to the Rotary Club and speak against it, or denounce violence on the floor. Why don't they start getting programs that would help to isolate violence rather than incubate it?"

"It's only a minority that wants violence. The great central group is tolerant of the fringe because it's the only game in town."

"It was the mainstream of students that was for McCarthy. But their victories have never been consummated; it's all kind of hanging in mid-air."

He spoke bitterly of the battle for "Hamburger Hill" in Vietnam and gestured dispiritedly toward the House. "Here we are sitting here again voting $1.2 billion for Vietnam," he said.

"The Armed Forces ought to take the position that they're the victims of civilian control, of bad policies. They should want to get out of this war. I still feel this enormous surge of resentment when I hear people criticize the Armed Forces. A lot of young people look down on soldiers now because of the war. This has never happened before."

A Frantic Pace

A few weeks ago, he told a campus audience on Long Island that he is "on the other side of the barricades" from the Students for a Democratic Society. The SDS has long thought of him as a tool of the establishment.

But if Lowenstein is now settling into the congressional environment, it is not immediately apparent.

He still moves at a frantic pace,

"I had lived in Seattle all my life, and I thought I knew quite a few people there. I had the impression after he was there that I didn't know anyone. Al seemed to know everybody in the city."

Typical Gathering

A typical Lowenstein social gathering might consist of two dozen people who have never met before waiting someplace for Lowenstein to arrive from a previous engagement, or perhaps several previous engagements.

When he finally arrives, often late in the night, he introduces all his friends to one another.

His correspondence is staggering. "I counted 2,000 people that he had, within a year, written to at least once," Bundy recalls. This averages out to nearly six letters a day, and helps explain, along with the speaking engagements and the endless organizational meetings, why he never seems to stop.

Still, in personal conversation he seems calm and undistracted. He rarely becomes angry. This, combined with an amazing memory, accounts for his national (and international) network of "contacts."

When he sets out to further a cause, which he does frequently, the network serves him well. Last year he used it to start the movement that brought down a president.

Lowenstein decided in the spring of 1967 that the only way to change Vietnam policy was to drive Lyndon B. Johnson from office.

It was a project which many of his friends thought was a waste of time. Traveling from city to city, the doggedly optimistic organizer called his friends together. The great plot began to take shape, the vast army of collegiate sappers and miners began to assemble.

What was needed next was a candidate, and Lowenstein felt it should be Robert F. Kennedy. But Kennedy could not be persuaded.

Finally Eugene McCarthy agreed to take up the banner. When Kennedy made his belated entry, he sought the aid of Lowenstein and his legions. But Lowenstein, although temperamentally drawn to Kennedy, felt he could not abandon the candidate to whom he had committed himself.

Battered and disheartened by the Democratic convention at Chicago, the remnants of the "respectable"

His opponent in the race was Mason L. Hampton Jr., a member of New York's Conservative Party who had gotten the Republican nomination.

The generation gap in the campaign was never more apparent than when Hampton distributed a campaign photograph of himself with four middle-aged women dressed as pom-pom girls and calling themselves "Mothers for Hampton."

At Lowenstein headquarters on election night, when victory was assured, the band played "Mrs. Robinson," and the congressman-elect announced that "young America has to be heard in Congress as it hasn't been heard before."

It is probably his close association with "young America" that accounts for what an aide calls the "aura of radicalism" that surrounds him.

He is basically an old-fashioned liberal, a child of the New Deal.

Lowenstein, the son of an upper-middle class New York family, became politically aware at a remarkably early age, taking an intense and partisan interest in the Spanish Civil War, which was concluded by the time he was 10 years old.

After finishing prep school at the age of 16, he turned his back on the Eastern schools and headed south to the University of North Carolina, where, he felt, he could do something for racial integration.

This led to intimidation on the campus — some of it physical — and prompted him to start body-building exercises. (He has continued to work out in a gym whenever he can.)

Although he was graduated from North Carolina in 1949, he was only beginning a life as a sort of student in perpetuity.

CIA Involvement

In the early 1950s, he was president of the National Student Association, a group that was, soon after his term ended, to become deeply involved with the CIA.

(The radical left, which dislikes Lowenstein intensely and refers to him as "Big Daddy," will frequently call him a "CIA agent" in campus debates, although he was not involved in the episode.)

After finishing at Yale Law School in 1954, he overturned a 4-F classification and served two years in the Army.

nam," he said.

"The Armed Forces ought to take the position that they're the victims of civilian control, of bad policies. They should want to get out of this war. I still feel this enormous surge of resentment when I hear people criticize the Armed Forces. A lot of young people look down on soldiers now because of the war. This has never happened before."

A Frantic Pace

A few weeks ago, he told a campus audience on Long Island that he is "on the other side of the barricades" from the Students for a Democratic Society. The SDS has long thought of him as a tool of the establishment.

But if Lowenstein is now settling into the congressional environment, it is not immediately apparent.

He still moves at a frantic pace, ignoring the creature comforts. He rented an apartment in Washington (his home is in Long Island), but found the $170 rent too much. When he spends the night in Washington it is usually in a friend's living room these days.

Food is only sustenance to him, and he has been known to breakfast on a hot dog and milkshake. He continues to live on the run, commuting to Long Island.

He continues also to be harassed by a shortage of funds. "If you just want to take care of the needs of your constituents, you can make it on what is provided," he said. "But not if you also want to have any sort of staff to handle substantive questions."

He mingles easily with the congressmen, some of whom probably once thought of him as a menace if they thought of him at all.

"My being here has symbolic value," he said. "It established that this is not a left-wing fringe movement. We can win elections."

"There's got to be some elected people who are saying these things. I had no illusions that in a few months here I could change the totality of injustice."

After pursuing a frenetic non-career for most of his adult life, Lowenstein is still hesitant to try to chart a course for himself.

"The first law of politics is to not think of what you're going to do in the future to get re-elected," he said. "It cripples you."

Freshman Lowenstein Is Unconventional

By RICHARD L. MADDEN
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Oct. 18 — On the second day of the 91st Congress last Jan. 6, Representative Carl Albert, the House Democratic majority leader, asked a new member, Allard K. Lowenstein of Nassau County, to sit in for a few minutes as acting majority leader.

Mr. Lowenstein performed his mission by standing up at the appropriate moment and saying: "Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn."

It was only a nicety — a small gesture of recognition by the House leadership to a newcomer. But it was in marked contrast to Mr. Lowenstein's unsuccessful effort five months earlier to gain a live microphone and recognition from Mr. Albert, the presiding officer, to adjourn the Democratic National Convention because of the violence outside the convention hall in Chicago.

The contrast was not lost on Mr. Lowenstein's wife, Jennifer, who teased him later: "Carl Albert makes you majority leader. John McCormack recognizes you. The microphone doesn't go dead. And all you can think to say is, 'I move we adjourn.'"

Strongly Against the War

Mr. Lowenstein has found more to say since then. After a period of quiet to give the Nixon Administration time to develop a policy on the Vietnam war, he has started to mobilize antiwar sentiment similar to his major participation in the successful movement to "dump" President Johnson in 1967-68.

"This is, at last, the Christmas by which American boys must be home," Mr. Lowenstein, who was active in the Vietnam Moratorium, said the other day. "If the President is unable to understand this fact, or unwilling to implement policies which will bring it about, the American people will have to break with their President on his conduct of the war. It will not be the first time that this will have happened in recent American history."

But for an intense, restless political activist whose causes have ranged from the plight of blacks in South Africa, the organization the Freedom Democratic party in Mississippi and the movement that brought Senator Eugene J. McCarthy into the Presidential race last year, the 40-year-old Mr. Lowenstein has surprised some of his colleagues in the House.

'Gaining Much Respect'

"Like any child prodigy, Allard was looked upon by some members with concern," said a fellow member from New York. "But they have found that he is not the wild-eyed maverick most people thought him to be. He's quietly doing his homework, and as a result he's gaining much respect in the House."

If nothing else, Mr. Lowenstein's first nine months in Congress have produced some rather interesting personal relationships.

Early in the session, for example, he was sitting one day in the House and was startled to find Representative L. Mendel Rivers of South Carolina, the white-haired chairman of the Armed Services Committee and a bete noir of liberals, standing over him.

Mr. Lowenstein, not quite sure of the appropriate thing to say, said: "Mr. Chairman, I have relatives who are constituents of yours." In fact, he went on, some of the relatives were named Rivers.

"Well," Mr. Rivers is said to have replied, "There's been a lot of intermarriage down South there."

At Odds over Assignment

After that Mr. Lowenstein and Mr. Rivers began to call each other "cousin" and joked about Mr. Lowenstein's desire to serve on the Armed Services Committee. Mr. Rivers has said that he really wants the freshman on his committee, although Mr. Lowenstein, who originally requested assignment to the committee, was relegated by the House Democratic leader, Carl Albert, to the Agriculture Committee instead.

"The procedures in the House are pretty appalling, but I don't hold it as a personal thing against the leadership," Mr. Lowenstein said in an interview a few nights ago. "They have to accept you for what you believe, and vice versa," he said. "I have not been given an ultimatum that I have to conform or else."

Although Mr. Lowenstein and other members of the House appear to be going out of their way to try to get along with one another, he still remains an unconventional member of a most conventional institution.

Members of his staff, which has undergone considerable turnover since January, think they finally have figured out how to cope with him. They now operate in two shifts. One shift works the normal office hours and into the evening. The second takes over to keep the office open as long as Mr. Lowenstein is there—normally until midnight or 2 A.M.

Informal Housing

The Congressman does not maintain an apartment or hotel room in Washington. At the end of his night's work he may call up one of his numerous friends and ask to sleep there. His staff also suspects that a few times he simply has spent the night on his office couch.

Unlike most Congressmen, particularly newcomers, Mr. Lowenstein has a national constituency in addition to the residents of the Fifth Congression-

been a District on Nassau County's South Shore. Trying to keep up with both contributes to his disorganized life.

He is besieged with invitations to speak on college campuses, where he is regarded as the oracle of the New Politics. A steady stream of students also comes to him. College students entering the nearly deserted Longworth House Office Building at night are automatically directed by weary guards to Mr. Lowenstein's cramped office on the fourth floor.

As a longtime power in the National Student Association, Mr. Lowenstein has sought to maintain his credentials on the campuses by frequent speaking trips to try to build a liberal student movement in opposition to campus radicals.

An Alternative Sought

"This country's going to be here for a long time, one way or the other," he told students at George Washington University. "You burn it down; you've still got to live in it. You turn it into an armed camp; you've still got to live in it. . . . There has to be something between Melvin Laird and the S.D.S."

When the requests for interviews and informal meetings build up too much, Mr. Lowenstein occasionally holds an open house at his office and invites in everybody. At one recent open house, students and young office workers from other Capitol Hill offices crowded in to soft drinks and beer and chat with Mr. Lowenstein and his guests. Among them were two Republican Representatives, Ogden R. Reid of New York and Donald W. Riegle Jr. of Michigan.

Mr. Lowenstein, as usual, was late. He strolled in carrying a pair of slacks rolled up under his arm. He is not one of the House's best dressed members. His suits are usually as rumpled as his thin dark hair.

The Congressman describes his role in the House up to now as "burrowing and building," adding "It's the plodding things that make things of consequence."

If the Republican-controlled Legislature in New York drastically alters his district in the Congressional reapportionment scheduled for later this year, Mr. Lowenstein could have a re-election problem of his own.

"I think next year is the time to decide about that," he said.

For now, he continued, he is concentrating on participating in the various "floating coalitions" in the House — getting this member to join him in some legislative cause or joining that member in another.

"The most foolish thing is to package yourself in one ideological bag with people who agree with you on everything," he said.

Busy with Bills

On his own and with other Democrats and even some Republicans, Mr. Lowenstein has sponsored more than 50 bills, including proposals calling for Congressional reform in the committee seniority system, the creation of a department of consumer affairs and an overhaul of the food stamp program.

Although Representative Shirley Chisholm of Brooklyn fought her way off the Agriculture Committee earlier this year, Mr. Lowenstein accepted his assignment on the theory that the rural-dominated committee does deal with such matters as food stamps for the poor and other consumer activities.

Committee sources say, however, that Mr. Lowenstein has not attended many committee meetings. "He hasn't made any enemies on the committee, but I don't think he's made too many friends either," one source said. "His interests seem to be elsewhere, and I think he's just marking time."

1. Mr. Allard K. LOWENSTEIN, a U.S. national, revisited Madrid during mid-August 1961, and immediately upon his arrival got in touch with Carlos ZAYAS Mauretegui, whom he had met on a previous trip to Spain in August 1959. ZAYAS, a member of the far-leftist Popular Liberation Front (Frente de Liberacion Popular-FLP), arranged interviews for LOWENSTEIN with the Madrid representatives of the Algerian National Liberation Front (FLN), who maintain a small office in the Tunisian Embassy. ZAYAS also introduced LOWENSTEIN to (fm) SUAREZ Carreno, an independent pro-Communist writer who cooperates with the small group of followers of Dionisio RUIRUEJO.
2. During his stay in Madrid LOWENSTEIN said that he is in touch with members of the liberal wing of the Democratic Party, and offered to put the Spanish opposition in touch with these liberal democrats.
3. LOWENSTEIN suggested that the Spanish political opposition should have a permanent representative in New York in order to keep the U.N. delegates current on Spanish political affairs and particularly to work with the delegations of the new African nations.
4. LOWENSTEIN also recommended that the opposition consider sending an outstanding Catholic oppositionist to the United States to persuade the Catholic Church hierarchy of the need to withdraw its support and sympathy from the Franco Regime, a position adhered to, according to LOWENSTEIN, by a large sector of the Catholic community in the United States because of their spotty information on Spain. Opposition contacts of LOWENSTEIN in Madrid suggested that Jose Maria GIL ROELES Quinones would be the best choice for such a mission.

1. Headquarters Comment. LOWENSTEIN visited Spain in August 1959 on an information-gathering mission for Senator Hubert Humphrey, then an aspirant for the Democratic Party presidential nomination. At that time LOWENSTEIN met with representatives of RIDRUEJO's party, the Social Party for Democratic Action (PSAD), the Christian Democratic Left (IDC), and ZAYAS, who at the time was the spokesman for the now defunct Socialist University Society (ASU). ZAYAS joined the FLP in early 1961.

LOWENSTEIN's address is 25 West 81st Street, New York City, or c/o the Department of Political Science, Stanford University, Palo Alto, California.

3. We would also appreciate receiving the copy of Nuestra Bandera (no. 33, I Trimestre 1962) which contained the article on "Encuesta sobre la Oposicion Sindical." FINAL REPORT

Approved for Release
Date 5 OCT 1982

However, caucuses were held in Prague during the II World Student Congress. The Congress was held from 13-28 August 1950. On 19, 21 and 22 August 1950 national students groups from Australia, Britain, Canada, Denmark, Finland, New Zealand, Norway, Scotland, South Africa, Sweden and the USNSA held caucuses during which time they developed a statement of their position. This took the form of thirteen points of issue with the IUS, and clearly showed that this was an opposition to the IUS policies as practised. However, the statement was ignored by the 2nd World Student Congress.

The 3rd National Student Congress of the USNSA met on 23 August 1950 and adopted a decision which showed that the USNSA was ready to discuss with other national student groups plans for a new international student organization which would embrace the doctrines set forth in the statement by the non-Communist groups at Prague.

The USNSA was represented at the International Student Conference in Stockholm in December 1950 by Mr. Allard K. Lowenstein, president of USNSA./

The USNSA representative did succeed in keeping the matter of a new organization open at the Conference when he and the Canadians engineered adoption of a resolution providing for a study of the framework at Stockholm with view of reporting on improvements to the next conference. This kept the issue of central organization open for a year.

Lowenstein also proposed an elaborate Students Mutual Assistance Program (SMAP). The proposal was devoted to the undeniable needs of students in the underdeveloped areas, thus being similar to economic aid programs of the United States, giving it a western orientation. Waterbury had assisted Lowenstein at this conference and had become a Member of the drafting committee of the conference.

DEBRE NOTES USSR-FRENCH UNITY ON MIDDLE EAST

Moscow TASS International Service in English 1356 GMT 11 Feb 69 L

[Text] Cairo, 11 Feb--"The situation in the Middle East is dangerous, while the continuing state of war is a threat not only to the participants in the conflict, but to other countries as well. This danger exists first of all because of Israel's reluctance to free occupied Arab territories, thus intensifying the feeling of displeasure and the rebuff of the Arab people and leading to the emergence of a resistance movement," the French minister of foreign affairs, Michel Debre, said in an interview given by him in Paris to a correspondent of the MENA agency and Cairo television.

The withdrawal of Israeli troops from Arab territories, he said, "must become the first step towards a just settlement of the Middle East crisis. The resolution of the United Nations Security Council adopted on November 22, 1967, is a decision which must be implemented," Michel Debre stressed.

The French minister of foreign affairs noted that the conference of representatives of four great powers within the framework of the United Nations organisations was necessary at present primarily because it was difficult to picture the possibility of agreement concluded directly by the Arabs and Israel.

"Any action by the four great powers in respect of the Middle East crisis depends directly on the desire of the sides either to facilitate the problem's solution or to complicate it," Michel Debre stressed.

Dwelling then on the positions of the Soviet Union and France in the Middle East crisis, the minister of foreign affairs noted their closeness. Both sides, he said, stand for the need of working out a timetable for the implementation of the basic clauses of the November 22, 1967, resolution of the United Nations Security Council.

U.S. EXERCISES, ISRAELI VENTURES COINCIDE

Moscow TASS International Service in English 0452 GMT 12 Feb 69 L

[From the press review]

[Text] Moscow, 12 Feb--Touching upon another provocative action by the Pentagon, three-day air exercises at the U.S. air force base Incirlik (southern Turkey), Captain V. Pustov of the Soviet Navy writes in "KRASNAYA ZVEZDA" (RED STAR) as follows: "It is hardly accidental that the holding of U.S. air exercises in the south of Turkey coincides with a fresh outburst of risky ventures of the Israeli military, with its threats against the Lebanon, incessant violations of the ceasefire agreement with Jordan. A question arises whether Pentagon and NATO headquarters intend to render at least psychological support for the Tel Aviv extremists by a demonstration of force near the borders of the Arab east."

CONGRESSIONAL VISITOR MOVES U.S.-AFRICAN TIES

Moscow Radio Peace and Progress in English to Africa 1430 GMT 11 Feb 69 L

[Text] U.S. Senator Goodell and Congressman Allard Lowenstein are in Africa. Before the visit is unofficial, but the report

III.. 12 Feb 69

This one is not the first visit of American representatives to Nigeria. Last year Vice President Hubert Humphrey and Assistant U.S. Secretary of State for African Affairs, Joseph Palmer, visited Nigeria.

Washington's attention to the situation in Nigeria is explained by the fact that the American monopolies are attracted by the natural resources of this African country, first and foremost the oil. The U.S. oil tycoons have long since been playing a sinister game to take possession of the black gold of Nigeria. They would like to push out their West European colleagues because they are dissatisfied with only 10 percent of the Nigerian oil that they are getting. To attain their aim the imperialist circles, and especially the U.S., are trying to fan up the separatist tendencies in Nigeria and to push the country into a fratricidal war. Although in words Washington comes out for the unity of Nigeria, actually it supports the Biafra splitters. The U.S. considers that it will be easier to foist its own will and take in hand the oil resources of Nigeria if it is divided. The U.S. State Department also has a so-called shock group on Biafran problems. Its task is to consolidate the U.S. positions in Biafra.

If the U.S. and other Western countries did not help the split-away Ojukwu regime, the civil war in Nigeria would have long since been ended. Money and arms flow from the U.S. to Biafra. Moreover, this is done secretly under the guise of extending humane aid. The Nigerians were enraged time and again to learn that Washington uses the welfare Catholic organization, such as the Caritas, to deliver weapons to Biafra. The U.S. has even given this organization a transport plane. It has also asserted that the planes of the International Red Cross Committee are sometimes used for the shipments of arms and ammunition to the Biafran splitters.

As always, the U.S. (CIA) has a hand in the matter. The Western press writes that with the money and help of the CIA, 80 tons of arms are daily shipped to the Biafran rebels, including rapid-firing rifles and ammunition, field artillery, and shells. With the help of the CIA, the mercenaries are back on the scene. Of course, the separatists do not have the money to pay these killers: the money comes from the coffers of the U.S. and other Western oil monopolies.

Apparently the situation in Nigeria will change. Observers think so because the reports about an imminent federal forces' offensive against the splitters. Apparently that is why the American visitors have become so frequent in Nigeria. In Lagos they hypocritically assure the federal government that they are for the unity and integrity of the country. Coming to Biafra, they express their admiration of the struggle of the separatists for the separation of the eastern region of Nigeria. Washington's hypocrisy is explained by the fact that the U.S. oil monopolies want to preserve and consolidate their positions whether victory will be with the federal government or the separatists.

LOWENSTEIN, according to a Washington Star article on 5/12/69, is in Charleston, South Carolina, taking part in the civil rights-labor movement demonstrations which have included marches, rallies, strikes, et al. The motivating force, as usual in such "civil rights" activities, has been the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), whose leader, Ralph ABERNATHY, denounced local and State authorities, claiming that "poor hospital workers here in Charleston have risen up against exploitation and oppression by the ruthless political, military, and economic machine," etc, etc.

The article noted that LOWENSTEIN is a member of the SCLC board of directors.
